WEATHER OF CONCERN

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

- A significant winter storm likely to impact the region during peak Thanksgiving holiday travel.
- A strong upper low currently west of Alaska is expected to reach the northern California coast by Tuesday.
 - Heavy snowfall is likely by Tuesday evening and continues through the overnight hours and into Wednesday.
 - Snow combined with breezy conditions may significantly reduce visibilities.
 - Accumulating snow is likely down into the upper foothills, potentially lower.
 - Hazardous mountain travel with significant delays is possible.
 - Snow showers will continue through Thanksgiving Day, possibly into Friday.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

- A significant and unseasonably cold storm system has the potential to bring a prolonged period of rain and mountain snow showers with gusty winds from portions of San Luis Obispo County Tuesday night, then affecting all of Southwest California Wednesday through Saturday.
 - Potential for flash flooding with mud/debris flows in recent burn scars.
- Winter Storm Watch in effect from Tuesday morning through late Thursday night above 3,000 feet.
 - Heavy snow possible.
 - Several feet of snow in the Sierra Nevada will be possible above 4,000 feet and the Kern County Mountains above 6,000 feet. Accumulating snow possible down as low as 3,000 feet.
 - Travel could be extremely difficult or impossible.
 - Hazardous conditions could impact holiday travels as well as commutes.
 - Significant reductions in visibilities are possible.
 - Downed trees and power outages possible.
